In the wake of the 2020 election, the United States has been embroiled in a heated debate over the future of democracy. Some argue that the country is on the verge of a new era of racial reckoning, while others fear that the rise of "wokeness" is leading to a dangerous form of identity politics.

At the center of this debate is the issue of critical race theory (CRT). CRT is a framework for understanding how race and racism have shaped American society. It argues that racism is not simply a matter of individual prejudice, but rather a systemic problem that is embedded in our laws, institutions, and culture.

CRT has become a lightning rod for controversy in recent years. Critics argue that it is divisive and that it teaches children to hate white people. Supporters, on the other hand, argue that it is essential for understanding the true history of racism in America and for creating a more just and equitable society.

The debate over CRT is not just an academic one. It has real-world implications for how we think about race, equality, and diversity. It is also having a major impact on our elections.

In the 2020 election, CRT became a major issue in the presidential race. Former President Donald Trump repeatedly attacked CRT, calling it "racist" and "divisive." President Joe Biden, on the other hand, has said that he supports CRT and that it is "important for us to understand the role that systemic racism has played in our history and in our present."

The debate over CRT is likely to continue in the years to come. It is a complex and challenging issue with no easy answers. However, it is an important issue that we need to grapple with as a nation. The future of our democracy depends on it.

The Bible and CRT

The Bible has a lot to say about race, equality, and diversity. In fact, the Bible is one of the most diverse books ever written. It contains stories about people from all over the world, from all walks of life.

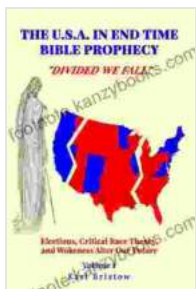

The Bible teaches that all people are created equal in the image of God. This means that we are all worthy of respect and dignity, regardless of our race, ethnicity, or gender.

The Bible also teaches us to love our neighbors as ourselves. This means that we should treat others with kindness and compassion, even if they are different from us.

The principles of equality and love that are taught in the Bible are essential for creating a just and equitable society. They are also essential for the future of our democracy.
